

Laurelton Hall

Louis Comfort Tiffany's Other Rooms

Tiffany's Laurelton Hall estate included a mansion of eighty-four rooms as well as various independent buildings. Not all artwork known to have come from Laurelton Hall, however, may be attributed to a precise location. For one, media attention of the time was focused on the principal rooms of the house, leaving scarce documentation on the rest. For another, Tiffany was continually incorporating cherished objects from his artistic career and from his other residences.

Top: At Laurelton Hall, there were rooms designed around Tiffany's collections of Chinese (seen here), Japanese, and Native American art, and selected objects from his own firms.

Above: One of the most notable outbuildings at Laurelton Hall was the chapel from the Tiffany exhibit at the 1893 World's Columbian Exposition in Chicago, which was installed at the estate in 1916.

Right: The art gallery, created in 1918, featured many of Tiffany's own paintings along with paintings he collected. The façade of the art gallery was decorated in a manner reminiscent of an eighteenth-century Indian residence (see cover).

Photographs by David Aronow, c. 1925.

Cover: Art gallery building, c. 1920s.

Objects in this gallery are from or related to the other rooms in Laurelton Hall. Unless otherwise noted, they were designed by Louis Comfort Tiffany (1848–1933) or one of his artists and made under the name of one of his companies.

A-Coll: The Artist's Collection

Tiffany intended his Long Island country estate, Laurelton Hall, built between 1902 and 1905, to become a museum to house works reflective of his quest of beauty—whether created by him personally, by one of his companies, or by others whom he felt especially inspirational. In the mansion, Tiffany displayed a limited number (around 300) of his own art glass, pottery, and enamelwork that he marked with the inscription A-Coll for “artist’s collection.” Most of these works were sold at Parke-Bernet’s (now Sotheby’s) five-day auction of property from Laurelton Hall in 1946. This trove of A-Coll art provides insight into Tiffany’s ideals and his concept of successful design. Hugh and Jeannette McKean, who rescued works from Laurelton Hall after the 1957 fire, had an early and discerning pursuit of A-Coll pieces. Because of their prescience in sifting through the levels of Tiffany artwork available in the 1950s through the 1980s, the Morse can represent to visitors something of the museum Tiffany himself curated at Laurelton Hall.

Right: This westernmost portion of the house included exhibition pieces and student art, as well as Tiffany's Tree of Life window (#8 in gallery)—the very last window he designed. The window's center is comprised of six roundels, each devoted to a subject Tiffany personally believed to be important in the instruction of art students.
